Abstract

In 2014, virtually no book has drawn so much attention or dominated the political-historical debate than Thomas Piketty's world-wide bestseller, „Capital in the Twenty-First Century”. In this book, the French economist describes the tendency of returns on capital to exceed the rate of economic growth as the main driver of inequality. Wealth always grows faster than income: according to Piketty's formula, we live in an age of rising inequality and the middle-class society that flourished for a generation after World War II was only a temporary aberration of an otherwise clear and distinctive trend of rising social inequality. Regardless of the methodological problems of Piketty's analysis, one major effect of his book is that it has given new stimulus to an ongoing and increasingly global debate on social inequality. Inequality figures prominently in public debates and is addressed by international organisations, governments, political parties and think tanks. Given its multidimensional nature, inequality affects almost every aspect of society; and its intersecting categories, drivers and impacts encompass a broad spectrum, ranging from income and wealth, gender, education, health and ethnicity to regional and international inequality.

Historians have recently paid much more attention to this multidimensional character of social change; and gender and ethnic inequality have come into focus in historical research. Less attention has been paid to the changing concepts and categories of social inequality and their interrelations with social and economic developments. Why was what type of social inequality seen as a problem? What identities, narratives and norms did societies produce to describe, accept, justify or fight social inequality? Answers to these questions are particularly interesting in a comparative view. Therefore, this conference brings together German and British historians studying the evolution of social inequality after 1945 from multiple perspectives. Participants will discuss a broad range of case studies from Great Britain and Germany. The conference will explore:

- how attention to various dimensions of inequality changed over time
- how certain groups of society were able to draw attention to their social inequality
- how the changing concepts of inequality were connected to political, social and economic events and developments.
